I have the honour to be,

Your obedient Servant,

NORMAN RAE,

for Librarian.

Museum.

GENTLEMEN,

Since my last report, significant changes have taken place in the Museum.

As previously intimated, negotiations were on foot for the disposal of the major portion of the Zoological specimens. Many of these were of intrinsic value, and it was felt that they were deserving of a better fate than the slow disintegration or more violent demolition to which they were being subjected, every time a change in the storage accommodation of the museum was found necessary. Hitherto, these specimens had lived in rickety glass cases, in semi-darkness, and of no interest or use to anybody. Many of them, nevertheless, were very beautiful and valuable preparations, and as Professor Gatenby put it—part of the “intellectual heritage” of the nation. They have now found a permanent home in the School of Zoology in Trinity College.

I would like to take this opportunity of thanking Professor Gatenby for his kindly advice and practical assistance in the matter of this collection. Rather than allow it to be dissipated and sold abroad, the Board of Trinity College offered for it a sum of £50—an offer which I had the President's authority to accept.

This move created a stir in other departments of the School. The newly established department of Biology found a quantity of material quite valuable for teaching purposes, and Dr. Widdess has removed a considerable number of specimens to new cases in his department.

Those of the skulls that had definite anthropological interest have been transferred to the School of Anatomy, under Professor Evatt, who also has provided special cases for their reception.

The Tasmanian head, and the mummies, have not been disturbed.

From the Pathological collection, the number of specimens borrowed for teaching and examination purposes has been up to the average, and seventeen fresh preparations have been added by the Curator, during the year.

I remain, Gentlemen,

Your obedient Servant,

WILLIAM BOXWELL,

Curator.
